The New York State Senate Committee on Crime Victims, Crime and Correction will be examining issues reported in the press raising questions about whether the Division of Parole is rationing drug tests or allowing those who flunk drug tests or fail to attend programs to remain free without any sanctions. These issues notably arise from the case of Howard Tucker, a 37 year old parolee who was shot to death by Albany police on February 16th following a traffic stop. City of Albany police officials say that Tucker possessed a loaded firearm and nearly ran over a police officer in an effort to flee. Press accounts have indicated that Tucker failed seven drug tests last year and that employees of the Division of Parole failed to test him in January because of purported shortages of drug testing kits. Parole Officers allegedly have said that supervisors have directed them to ration tests.
