Created during the 2022 legislative session, the Commission on Ethics in Lobbying and Government (CELG) is New York's new state ethics regulation and enforcement body, succeeding the former Joint Commission on Public Ethics (JCOPE). The new commission consists of 11 members appointed by the governor, the leaders of both party conferences in the Senate and Assembly, the Attorney General, and the State Comptroller. Nominees to the Commission must be approved by an Independent Review Committee composed of the deans of New York's 15 American Bar Association accredited law schools. Under the Independent Review Committee's procedure, appointing authorities must publicly announce a prospective nominee and provide an opportunity for the submission of public comment at least seven business days before the nomination is formally submitted. After the formal submission of a nomination, the Independent

Review Committee will have up to 30 days to conduct interviews and act on the nomination.
