

Senate Passes Schneiderman Bill To Prosecute Domestic Abusers For Destroying Property

ERIC T. SCHNEIDERMAN May 5, 2009

ISSUE: CODES

COMMITTEE: CODES

ALBANY -- The state Senate today overwhelmingly passed a bill (S4306) that strengthens the punishment for domestic abusers who engage in violence against a victim's property. Under current law, a person is not criminally liable for damaging shared property if he or she has either a right to do so or believes that right exists. That means if an individual destroys the property of a spouse or domestic partner, he or she could not be held criminally liable. The bill passed today, sponsored by Codes Committee Chair Sen. Eric T. Schneiderman (D-Manhattan/Bronx), protects victims of domestic violence by eliminating that overly restrictive requirement.

"Perpetrators of domestic violence should not be able to destroy a victim's property and go unpunished," said Sen. Schneiderman. "For too long, New York looked the other way and silently approved this kind of criminal behavior. As a result, the victims of domestic violence were victimized again by a criminal justice system that provided them no opportunity to hold their abusers responsible for malicious conduct. With the passage of this bill, those days will soon be over "

The bill clarifies that damaging property can be a criminal act, even if the person who destroys the property has an ownership interest in it. Moreover, a spousal relationship does not protect someone from prosecution.

"It doesn't matter if you are a spouse or a domestic partner, if you're intentionally destroying a victims property, there will be consequences. When a crime has been committed, no relationship ought to shield abusers from prosecution," added Schneiderman.

The bill passed in the Assembly 146-2 in February and Gov. Paterson indicated he will support it.