Senate Recognizes Maple 'Sugar Shacks' As Farm Buildings; Honors Maple Industry

State Senator Patty Ritchie announced today the state Senate passed a bill she sponsored to make bureaucrats recognize maple sugar shacks as agricultural buildings. The bill aims to cut red tape that threatens the state's growing maple industry.

The Senate also passed a resolution, at the height of "sugaring season" throughout New York State, honoring the state's 550 maple producers whose efforts have made the Empire State the second largest maple producing state in the nation.

"When I became Senate Agriculture Committee Chair, I was shocked to discover that, in addition to battling late winter cold and waist-high snow drifts, New York's 550 maple producers were battling government bureaucrats who wanted to treat seasonal 'sugar shacks' like regular commercial buildings, subject to all sorts of expensive and difficult rules and regulations,” Senator Ritchie said. “I told them I would make it one of the Senate Agriculture Committee’s top priorities, and am glad to deliver on that promise today.”

“When I was growing up, I can still remember my first visit to a ‘sugar shack,’ ” Senator Ritchie said. “Throughout Central and Northern New York, visiting a ‘sugar shack,’ learning how syrup is made, and enjoying the many other fine, natural maple products, has become a ritual of spring. This legislation ensures that these small business owners can continue to invite their customers to come and watch, learn and enjoy.”

New York State Maple Producers Association Vice President Dwayne Hill, of Shaver-Hill Maple Farm of Harpersfield, praised the Senate passage of the bill.

“When we needed someone to stand up for New York’s 550 Maple Producers, State Sen. Patty Ritchie led our campaign to reduce the red tape and end the mindless bureaucratic interference that was damaging our marketing efforts and crippling our family businesses.”

The bill was sent to the Assembly for action.
