QUEENS, NY--Senator Michael Gianaris' Bed Bug Notification Bill for New York City Public Schools was signed into law by Governor Andrew Cuomo. Senator Gianaris wrote and first introduced the legislation in 2007, when he was a member of the Assembly. The legislation requires that the Parent Teacher Association and all parents of potentially affected New York City school children receive notification from school health officials upon detection of bed bugs in their child's school. The notification includes informational brochures that enable parents to take preventative steps and make more informed decisions regarding the health and safety of their children and families.

"The best way to combat bed bug cases is to educate parents and teachers" Senator Gianaris said. "Children should be able to go to school and get a good education without the threat of bed bugs hindering their ability to learn."

The number of confirmed cases of bed bugs in New York City public schools has severely increased in the last academic year, according to recent statistics released by the New York City Department of Education. Public schools reported 1,700 confirmed cases from September 2010 through January 2011, with 80% of the cases reported in November, December and January. Compared to last year's total 1,019 cases, schools are on pace to triple the number of bed bug inflections this academic year.

In 2010, New York City officials pledged $500,000 to raise public awareness in an effort to fight the bed bug epidemic. The Education Department's Office of School Support Services also implemented a four-step protocol for handling potential bed bug cases in schools.
