“Workforce development is a top priority,” said Senator Larkin. “I look forward to hearing from leaders in business, education, state and local governments, and other workforce experts in an effort to find feasible solutions to some of the problems our workforce faces today. We must do everything we can to ensure that individuals who want a job have every opportunity to obtain one.”

It will review state education policies to maximize opportunities for high school and college students to obtain industry certifications and take career-themed courses for jobs that are most in demand. It will discuss how to improve the sharing of information about regional and statewide workforce trends to ensure job training programs are targeting the skills needed by employers and explore the job training resources available to unemployed and under-employed New Yorkers to help them achieve self-sufficiency.

"I applaud Senator Larkin's commitment to address the nationwide skills gap", said Orange County Executive Steve Neuhaus. "I believe that his knowledge and experience will help the Task Force develop real solutions that will help create more jobs for our families and improve our economy."
