Spring 2016

Since the dawn of the Industrial Revolution, labor has moved to meet the demands of industry. Where jobs are available, people have flowed to them like water running down a river. Today, as then, human capital flows to where the jobs are. In doing so, the societies of the developed world have become the most diverse places in human history.

However, that diversity has repeatedly hit artificial barriers when trying to reach the top.

State Senator James Sanders Jr. (D-Rochdale Village) yesterday voted against confirming new trustees for the State University of New York (SUNY) citing concerns about a lack of diversity within the group and across New York State authorities.

While Sanders believes the new appointees are highly qualified and wishes them the best, he could not in good conscience perpetuate a system that excludes people of color, whether deliberately or unintentionally.

Presently the SUNY board of trustees is comprised of 17 members – 14 white men, 2 black men, 1 white woman, and 1 Cuban woman. The members are appointed by the governor, with the consent of the senate. This year's nominations are: Robert Duffy, Courtney Burke and Edward Spiro, all of whom are Caucasian. They were confirmed by the senate despite the opposition.

Sanders cited information distributed by the New York State Assembly Puerto Rican and Hispanic Task Force, which highlighted data showing the lack of diversity among New York State Authorities. In a 2015 survey of 451 board members from 43 state authorities, 87.3 percent were white, 6 percent were black, 4 percent were Hispanic and 2 percent were Asian. As of the 2010 census, New York State has a population of 19,378,102 people, 12,740,974 (65.7%) white and 3,073,800 (15.9%) black.

"Our great university system should have representation as diverse as our great state," Sanders said. "When we look at the numbers, something doesn't add up. There are striking discrepancies between the demographics of our state and its representation in state authorities. We can, and should, do better."
