Save a fish for the future: Tips for catch and release

- Use a dehooker to remove a hook quickly.
- Use artificial lures as much as possible; fish tend to swallow natural bait deeply, making for a more severe wound.
- Use barbless hooks for quicker release and less injury. On lures you can often replace treble hooks with single hooks.
- If you must remove a fish from the water, use a shallow landing net which reduces slime loss due to excessive handling. Keep the fish from flopping around, which aggravates wounds, causes slime loss and adds to exhaustion.
- If you must handle a fish out of water, wet your hands to reduce slime loss.
- Hooks in the mouth, gills or gullet should be carefully removed with pliers, a hook disgorger or a dehooker. If a fish is "gut hooked," cut the line and leave the hook.
- Use circle hooks! Circle hooks have been proven to dramatically increase survival rates of released fish. In a recent study on released striped bass and tuna, lethal wounds from circle hooks were 1.6% compared to 27.5% for J-hooks. Talk to your local bait shop and tackle shop owner about their use. Circle hooks are now widely available in all sizes to catch everything from bluegills to big bass. Use circle hooks!
- After removing the hook, quickly return the fish to water. Release it upright, head first. If the fish does not move off quickly, gently move the fish back and forth to force water over the gills. Release when the fish is strong enough to swim away.
