

the disease, whereas another one, perhaps in your community, could be doing great work providing services to patients and their families, make sure the charity you are considering supporting is a bona fide, tax exempt 501 (c) (3) public charity (all of the charities evaluated by Charity Navigator meet this basic requirement), such conversations will give you insight into how well the charity knows where it stands and where it plans to go, create a budget for how much you can (or would like to) give and once you are assured that the charity is making an impact, make a commitment to support their work for "the long haul."

This shows that you have to find the right charity that you are interested in. In summary, you have to find the right charity that you are interested in.

You can reuse to save the earth by getting paid to return empty bottles and making new goods from old clothes. For example, in the website www.eco-stylist.com says that "You get cash in your pocket and someone reuses your item instead of buying new, they sort of all the items sending wearable pieces to entrepreneurs around the world to sell and recycle the unwearable pieces, they want everything from your ripped t-shirts to your Nikes, you can sew them, bust out some stain remover, patch them, or just bring them to a tailor and for starters you can cut them up and use them as rags." This explains that instead of
