

What qualities do you have that you are thankful for?

Thanksgiving is not just a time to gather around with family; it is a time to appreciate what you have. During Thanksgiving, people show gratitude for the people, possessions, and qualities they have. At Thanksgiving, I take the time to recognize that all the qualities I possess are blessings. One Thanksgiving tradition in which my family partakes is sharing aloud what we are thankful for. This Tradition makes me aware of all the qualities my parents and siblings see in me. This is how I recognize the positive qualities that I have.

There are many different traits and characteristics I have, according to the members in my family. Some examples of these are that I am caring, determined, loving, hard-working and helpful. My Grandmother tells me that whenever she is in need of assistance, I am quick to step up and offer to help out. My parents show gratitude when I constantly check in on them and show them that I care. My mother is aware of my determination when I am given a complicated assignment or task. My father sees me as hard-working, when I strive to help him work out everyday problems around the house. My sister sees me as a loving sister when I listen to her problems and support her. These are some good qualities I possess, that are the reason why I am described as a good person.

I am very thankful that I have all of these qualities in me. These qualities are important to me because they determine the first impressions that I make on people. This usually affects how the relationship I build with the other person turns out in the future. It also determines the way that I see myself. It is important for me to recognize things about myself because it makes me more self aware, which allows me to keep up the good habits I have, and grow out of the bad ones, thus allowing me to grow into a great person.
