

Thanksgiving Senator Project

By: Michelle Tello

No one really thinks that thanksgiving is an important holiday, but it is. It gives us time to appreciate everything we have, family, friends, and ourselves. People think of the holiday for the food and yes that's a big part of it. However, it also gives us time to be around what matters the most, family, no matter how cliché that sounds. Family doesn't have to be by blood. It can be whoever, they just have to be there for you and feel like family. I have a couple of people that aren't blood related, but they are my family. I am unbelievably grateful for them. I am also most grateful for who I am and my personality. I'd say I am a friendly, caring, kind, hardworking, responsible, and respectful person. But obviously I have a long life ahead of me, so I'm still growing and learning.

Life is a rollercoaster. There are so many twists and turns. People make mistakes and it's okay as long as you get up and learn the lesson after hitting the ground.

Being a person that is friendly, kind, and caring can be a little difficult because people can use you and hurt you. To avoid that I try to be careful with the friends I make. During this school year so far I'd say I'm doing good. I have good relationships with others and my family. They all give me love and I am so fortunate to even be given all the love I get. Being a person with these positive traits, such as being respectful and responsible has also led me to taking care of myself. Saying I am thankful for myself seems selfish, But it's not because we all are evolving and deserve to be proud of ourselves. Thanksgiving is a time to be grateful for everything good in our life, so take the time and be grateful.
