

Good morning Chairwoman Weinstein and members of the Committee on Ways and Means. My name is Ramond Curtis, and I am the State Policy Manager for Veterans Education Success, a nonprofit veterans service organization that advocates for public policy to protect and defend the integrity and promise of the GI Bill.

We are thrilled that New York State is focusing on protecting students from predatory for-profit schools because we know how critical postsecondary education attainment is to economic success. People in the United States who earn a postsecondary degree or credential earn $1 million MORE over the course of their lifetime than people with a high school diploma or less. As the United States emerged from the most recent recession, the number of new jobs created that required a college degree dramatically dwarfed the number of jobs needing only a high school degree. In 1973, only 28% of jobs required postsecondary education and training. However, by 2020, that number will increase to 64%. College attainment also improves people's lives: College graduates are healthier, less reliant on public assistance, earn more, pay more in taxes, and are more civically engaged.

However, as the Committee is aware, not all colleges are created equal. Unfortunately, because of a loophole in federal law, GI Bill usage is currently dominated by low-quality online colleges that soaked up 39% of all GI Bill tuition and fees between FY 2009 and 2017, and that routinely over-promise and under-deliver. This leads many students to drop out and not complete college.

According to new data recently released by Center for an Urban Future, an independent nonpartisan policy organization focused on reducing inequality across the state of New York, the for-profit college sector accounts for just 6 percent of all undergraduate students in New York, but 41 percent of borrowers who defaulted after five years. They also published a report last April which found that in 73 percent of all for-profit programs, graduates earned less than $25,000, which is equivalent to the average wage of high school graduates between ages 25 and 32. In other words, attending a for-profit college left the students no better off than if they had never gone to college. In 38 percent of for-profit programs, graduates' student loan repayments totaled more than 8 percent of their annual earnings, which places an enormous burden on students as they enter the workforce. With such poor results, it is even more concerning that the worst performing for-profit schools receive tens of millions annually in federal and state subsidies. In 2015 alone, more than $37 million from New York's Tuition Assistance Program went to colleges with at least one program that failed or nearly failed the U.S. Department of Education's Gainful Employment standard for post-college outcomes. $31 million went to colleges at which no more than 30 percent of former students made any payments to their loan principal within three years of entering repayment.

A national report published in November of 2017 by The Century Foundation, one of the oldest public policy research institutes in the country, found that students who enrolled at a for-profit college in recent years are 200 times more likely to end up filing a fraud claim than students at nonprofit colleges, and 1,100 times more likely than students at public colleges. These findings were based on a review of nearly 100,000 federal "Borrower Defense claims," which are applications for loan relief from students who maintain that they were defrauded or misled by a college.

It has become abundantly clear that for-profit colleges across the state and country are not properly serving students, who are left with worthless credits and enormous student debt. As the US Senate Education Committee reported, for-profit colleges serve only 13% of students but account for half of the nation's student loan default problem.

As some of you may already know, one of the primary demographics that for-profit schools target is the veteran community. Sadly, this is caused in large part by a loophole in federal law. Federal law prohibits for-profit colleges from receiving more than 90% of their revenues from federal education aid. The purpose of this revenue cap is to provide a market test, ensuring that federal student aid funds aren't used to prop up low quality schools that are unable to attract at least 10% of their revenue from private sources, including employers, scholarship providers, and families. However, the Post 9/11 G.I. Bill and Defense Department tuition assistance are not listed in the policy as federal education aid. That means that for-profit schools can legally receive 100% of their revenues from federal education aid, as long as 10% of it comes from the GI Bill or tuition assistance. Or, in other words --from servicemembers and veterans. Because of this loophole, for-profit colleges are VERY eager to enroll veterans. So much so that many rely on extremely aggressive and deceptive recruiting methods in order to maximize veteran enrollment. To quote Holly Petraeus, wife of General Petraeus and the former head of Service Member Affairs at the US Consumer Financial Protection Bureau: "For every service member or veteran enrolled at a for-profit college and paying with military education funds, that college can enroll nine others who are using only Title IV money [to pay their tuition]. This gives for-profit colleges an incentive to see service members as nothing more than dollar signs in uniform, and to use aggressive marketing to draw them in."

Today, for-profit college salesmen continue to recruit on military bases and inside VA hospitals. The U.S. Government Accountability Office ran two undercover investigations, sending agents to pose as students. Agents reported that every single one of the 15 large for-profit colleges they visited deceived them about the quality of education, cost, and likely job and salary for graduates. Four colleges engaged in actual illegal fraud (such as directing students to falsify federal student loan applications).

A two-year investigation by the U.S. Senate Education Committee produced similar results, finding extreme levels of deception by for-profit colleges about every aspect of the college (from tuition and the number of credits needed to graduate, to the programs even offered at the school, to the accreditation and transferability of credits to other colleges, to the quality of education to job prospects for graduates). Some for-profit colleges even sign students up for high-interest private loans without disclosing the true terms of loans, and in some cases without the student's knowledge. Some for-profit colleges go so far as to promise a career in fields that require a license – such as law, plumbing, electricity, and medical fields – only for students to find out after graduation that their college is not recognized or properly accredited and graduates are not eligible to obtain licenses required for the career.

Our organization works with more than a dozen for-profit college salesman turned whistleblowers who help us identify deceptive tactics by for-profit schools because they feel terrible about how their for-profit college continued to target and defraud veterans of their education benefits. What they tell us is similar to quotes you may have read in news stories such as:

Patrick Flynn, a former recruiter from Education Management Corporation's South University online: "It just got to the point where I felt like I was lying to these people on a regular basis.... Honestly, I just felt dirty doing the things I was doing. It's almost like they were trying to make me take advantage of people's belief in what this education was going to get them, when I didn't buy into it myself."

Eric Shannon, a former recruiter out of Brooks College: "We're selling you that you're gonna have a 95 percent chance that you are gonna have a job paying $35,000 to $40,000 a year by the time they are done in 18 months.... We later found out it's not true at all."

New York State's 141 for-profit colleges offer a variety of career-oriented programs, ranging from courses in medical billing to programs in building trades. We know that these institutions are crossing ethical and legal lines to boost their veteran enrollment across the country. In August of 2013 The New York Attorney General recouped more than $10 million for New York students who were deceived by colleges owned by Career Education Corporation (Sanford Brown, Briarcliffe, American Intercontinental U. Colorado Technical U, and Cordon Bleu) for deceiving prospective students about their job prospects, including promising they could work as sonographers when the training did not leave them eligible to even sit for the licensing exam. Earlier this month 49 state attorneys general, including the AG for NY, reached a settlement with Career Education Corp., securing just under $500 million in debt relief for over 179,000 students nationwide. The settlement is the result of a five-year investigation, which began in 2014 after states received complaints from students. If we hope to ensure that New York students seeking post-secondary education are protected, our state legislature must work to develop regulatory practices and policy that filters out predatory for-profit programs.

Veterans Education Success has received more than 4,000 complaints from veterans who were deceived or defrauded by a for-profit college. Many of them are from New York. Before closing, I'd like to read to you some quotes from NY veterans. For confidentiality sake, I will not use their full name:

Brittnie of Fort Montgomery, NY told us: "I was told this was one of the best schools to attend while being in the military as it was all online . They had failed to mention that they were not accredited and the price per class was through the roof. Credits don't transfer to hardly any schools. When I requested to withdraw I was constantly being called to re-enroll and felt harassed."

Aimee of Amherst, NY told us: "I was recruited by University of Phoenix while I was still on active duty, with the promise of a high-quality degree that I could pursue while still in service. I am still paying on those loans, and my degree was not recognized by employers well. Also, few of my credits transferred when I pursued my current degree of practice. I am in tremendous debt now as a disabled veteran because I had to pursue a second degree path in order to have a career after my military service. Very disappointing."

We look forward to working with you on specific steps the Legislature can take to protect students in New York from unscrupulous salesmen at low-quality colleges.
