

Earth Day
By Madison Galeas

Today is Earth Day. I should have thrown out that stupid plant.

I woke up this morning, and a plant appeared out of nowhere. I was confused, but I put the plant near my window in my room. I went on with my day. I got dressed for school. I went to get my bag before I got in my car. I didn't see the plant. I didn't think much of it. Everyone was acting so oddly. I barely saw people at school. Some people were talking about having a plant pop out of nowhere. I was like, dang, so I wasn't the only one that got one.

My day ended, and I drove home, it was around 1 pm. I went to my room and just finished my homework and on my desk, I see the plant again. But this time it doubled in size. I was so shocked and scared. I fell asleep and woke up. I saw a monster with grass and everything.

I looked for my plant and then realized that was my plant. My soul left my body. The monster spoke to me, "Why don't you humans take care of us? We want love and care, just like you guys." I looked and thought it was a monster. It has a point. I took the thorns of the monster and said, "I promise you; I will take care of you. I will care and feed you. Make sure you're okay. You may not be human, but you have feelings and I'm sorry I didn't realize how us humans really only think of ourselves." The monster shrunk in size to its normal size and since then, I learned to take care of and love the earth. We have to love the earth and care about the earth just like we love and take care of ourselves. We are one with the earth.

Madison Galeas, 9th grader, Westbury High School

This essay was created in the Adelphi University STEP/LPP program.