

Messiah

The things I've gone through during the three months of school as a senior are a lot. But I've seen things that I'm progressively getting my life better. I not only found a spot where I could start practicing my art, but also managed to meet new people along the way.

I've started applying to colleges that I wanted to attend, even though it's not what I initially intended; however, it's fine as long as I can have the college experience I want. I've also gotten one of the few games I wanted during this time in October. Forwarding to this month, I got braces. I never thought that having braces would make you go through pain to have straight teeth. So now, I've once thought that they had braces just for the aesthetics of it, but I now see them as a sign of respect for what they had to go through to get straight teeth.

I've always had a vision of myself being financially stable so that I can get the things I've always wanted in life. Getting a decent pc, having a few collectible toys, and even just going somewhere to donate at one point. I'm just glad I've made people want to know me, as I have a hard time introducing myself when I'm in the spotlight. However, I'm working on trying to fix that on my own, since I don't want to be someone who's shy forever.

Someday I'll become a better artist. I may draw well, but eventually I'll learn how to apply color theory, values, and the other art principles I need to know. I look forward to a future where I can become a great artist. I also want to become a great writer, as it's a valuable skill to have. I'll ask my teachers for help if I get the chance to.

This is what my life is like at this moment. I want to progress even further and become a lot more confident, going to college with the skills I have and making my family proud of who I've become.
